A NOTE FROM JEANNETTE

AORE Executive Director

One of the ironies of being an outdoor facilitator is that it can be really fulfilling work, but it can also be really lonely work. When you run a program or department, or are responsible for others in day to day work, there is little time for reflection on what is and isn't working, learning about new ideas or ways to lead, or becoming aware of trends and industry topics. These are the reasons why I prioritize going to conferences. Conferences allow me to immerse in my professional development in a way that I come away invigorated and ready to make my work transformational. I also love reconnecting with old friendships and I get excited meeting new and interesting people.

One of the most challenging things for me at a conference is being torn between multiple sessions that I want to attend that are at the same time! This does happen, but its also allowed me to learn how to take initiative and seek out the presenter I could not learn from at a social or networking event, or take them to coffee to hear what they have to share. The networking at a conference is second to none - from finding a new employee to learning about a potential job or internship, hearing about a program's recent success or connecting with a brand so that can buy the right gear or work with them for their risk management, DE&I, or other consulting services.
